The by-laws and articles of incorporation are a worker cooperative’s core governing documents. They determine how power, money, and information flow through a firm, addressing things like how an employee becomes a worker-owner (also known as a member-owner) of the cooperative, and how profits are distributed.

The membership agreement is the contract between the individual worker-owners and the co-op. Workers sign this document when they buy their membership share, and it is the legal mechanism that makes a worker a worker-owner.

The membership agreement is NOT an employment contract. The agreement outlines the relationship between worker-owners and the co-op, and specifies:

- An agreement to follow the rules in the by-laws
- Cost of the membership share
- Distribution of the cooperative’s profits
- A process and schedule for profit distribution
- Limitations on selling the membership share

In most cases, this membership agreement can simply be filled out and used as is. However, the offer and sale of membership shares requires careful attention to federal and state securities laws and to other state laws regarding stock purchase agreements. A qualified attorney or other expert should be consulted for assistance in adapting this membership agreement to your needs.
